I would like a new principal that looks to the students needs and wants. Also, I'd like a principal that will also get to know all of the students and teachers so we're all comfortable with them.

More creative freedom.

High school students are at the peak age to explore and express who they are. It starts with the emotions and carries over to everything including dress. Some people can't help how they look don't point it out. I am a gender-neutral student forced to conform to traditional gender roles with creativity stifled I have little ways to express myself so I have become introverted. I tend to lash out due to bottled emotions. If we had more freedom less rules there is less need to rebel. Rebellion is caused by rules people don't agree with. If students get more involved with making rules there is less to disagree with, making lashing out rebellion and bad behavior less likely.

I will choose not to be picky in my preferences for a new principal. I simply desire a principal who has an understanding of the many ways students learn/act and can react accordingly. Also, one who has knowledge of mental disorders (namely things like Asperger's or dyslexia etc. Things that can hinder learning, social or academic) and can handle them in a mature manner would be most beneficial for Newfield.

I want the new principal to be nice and funny and not mean to other kids and not have favorites and discuss things with the students.
